Practicing Allyship in Integrated Care

Championing health equity for historically underserved and marginalized populations often involves speaking up and using one's embedded advantages to practice inclusion and share decision-making and resources when it comes to health care services.

This is especially the case when one doesn't identify with historically marginalized groups, yet has privilege, access to resources, and decision-making ability on a professional level in health care services.

Advancing equity in health care services requires practicing cultural humility—curiosity and willingness to learn, to reflect on one's own cultures and experiences, and to recognize that others have expertise in their own experiences.
